At its perihelion it passed nearer the sun than any known comet, with the single exception of that of 1680, computed by Sir Isaac Newton, and in the discussion of which in The Principia he broached the first approximation to the true theory of the cometary tail. These two comets approached so close to the sun that it would seem quite possible that they touched its surface, or, at least, swept nearer than the solar corona. It would not have been an absurd hypothesis, that they were ejected from the sun at the time of penetration, had it not been for the fact that the comet of 1680 was seen on its way down to the sun, and for the remarkable phenomenon which we are about to describe concerning the comet of 1843. It may be claimed, as a not impossible hypothesis, that each of these comets.

It would only involve a force which would double the greatest velocity given to the solar field of hydrogen. But a juster interpretation of the phenomonen, and one which avoids the necessity of an extravagant volcanic action, is to be found in the relation between the comets and the meteors. It is simply the splash of the falling meteors. In about an hour and a half the comet of 1843, like that of 1680, went et of 1843, like that of 1680, went round the sun from one side to the Planing and Molding et of 1843, like that of 1680, went other.
